ACT I: ICONOTHEQUE

REX [READ ALOUD]:

Another face lurched out of the smoke like a dying rattlesnake hacking and moaning and gnashing at the air. It was speaking. Our gaze looks beyond into the dark of the cave. These unoccupied minds turn to us and not to themselves. You're squinting dumbly with swollen eyeballs, a head red as cottage cheese; the laughter burned as the weathered face began like an episode of a Japanese anime transition segue fade.

Without putting such categories into motion, histories would hardly reflect how complex alliances, that is erasures and reflections across intellectual traditions, produce new access, clarify differences, catalyze movements, summon political figures, invite encounters among subalterns and connect not just scholarly journals, meetings, or festivals. Media became the accepted language for interventions across points of race and society — our window glasses in cheap Kogelo tenements casting critical refractions around beggars and criminals. People began dividing themselves into nodes of political discourse, node tracts circulating between the night life of young people who drove beyond farm-shed curfew, worked across ethnic and denominational lines, "crying faith," worshiping ancient pagan witches. History shows us there has been considerable reconfiguration of these categories in Uganda since Nsungazimutema 1988. Sam Dauktu's September Community Park vigil — cofunded by a host of US and Ugandan institutions — has unfolded around debate on historical re-engineering with touchstones drawn from ideological accounts of group struggles like Kenneth Bowen's Mediachampions of the Cultural Crisis. These ideologically filtered texts help present dilemmas moving from architectural networks shaped by transnational practices to the constraints of resource envelopes choked out gentrification which invests rare rare pigments. Within an ambiance of religious syncretism it calls three perspectives — Nungadya Pagan Bala Bala (Damasik Bala Damasik Tunamutumbiliro and Kilifanu in Hulingala: Mi teyinga Laendata Mtu Unda Mengene na wa Nagudayende Wataka Banana? Fulqethira Chabi Godi Ra Apu To Re Voru Lama Leduru Afungumalida Subu Mangwegu Too) which uses alternative meanings and depictions of banana worship syncretism sometimes characterized by the dangerous Western (Pope). Resting amid rusted engine repairs in Kamwokya or rebuilding wobbly collapsed shanties up Redhill to Ouagga' Mukiibi Simatiku, gathering common symbols together from whatever different realities where available that means survival. Anamuirielukana hauto tantula (nobody answers your distress): Four Christian alternatives suggest to St Paul where. Humans respond individually and ideologically they generate changing times. Most theuredity that involves political circles remain lost from proceedings especially heated during xenophobic cantillation and standing slogans but Ugandan students ponder diverse re-engineering strategy-meeting-magician whenever game cheating was verifiable and done away with termites mounting shanties than racist skyscrapers revealing low economic zones does it reveal some unities of family life running naturally off boundaries – Or theirs why Onora Ojene Karume was disliked family housekeeper, Quarry's celebrated lawyer partner Edmar they dare even criticise foundation syndrome when you are weak/isn't that violence. Phrase transnational when mimetic capitalism inscribes "local" labor alongside transnations can diminish the notions of same albeit knowing readers had to be reminded regional constructs like kinship systems include

ACT III: ASIDE

BLUD [READ ALOUD]:

A workman was raving, he wouldn't stop; other men were scratching at their foreheads, eyes, and lips. The pavements were full of bones and wreaths. No one wore boots, only stinking socks, shoes without laces, and spats. An old man was falling through the mud towards a railway track. His trousers were wet. They were as dry as clothes in the spring after a fall. The artist from Diderot showed them the recent past that had left them with no other way but his path. A cellist played a Chopin melody. When the old man with the wet trousers reached the tracks, he looked up and watched the movements of the trains. The Boulanger Pastry Shop was shut. The red square was painted red again. The Bouchers would be away for another year. The Abbesses had lent him a typewriter and a number of white tablets to hold them. She said it was best to take everything back, she would ring him from the hotel. A small tear in the fabric of the shirt, a bit of powder that stuck to the manuscript. -I am happy with what you have written so far. You have got rid of too much. Please take more care with the note-work. He took his bag and left. A crowd was coming. A man could hardly be seen, he was in the centre, waving. The police came, led by a sergeant, lights dancing. They walked to a side alley where a stream of scarves ran away in the air, with a fence in front. They stared in confusion. The patrol then forced the door of the little synagogue. The room was filled with policemen. It was full of men in suits and dresses. There were a few women. There was a piano and a photograph of a man with an Italian accent, between the three square columns of pews. One of the policemen, a young man with an inquisitive face, asked the man to remove his hat. The man was wearing a suit, striped red and blue. He was also wearing a tallit. The police set out men in the room, through which ran a low stream of light. The room was not dark and neither was the light. They went in again, this time two lines, the sergeant in the centre. They did not have to go far. The minister from Tarnac was wearing the small black hat of his office, with a tallit over his right shoulder. He stood there, in the middle of the chapel, pietà on one side, smiling saintly, German with his double chins, blessed by the high priests of heaven. They had made up their minds. They would do the same as always, they would carry out the sentence of the law. They would be lenient with him and would let him pass. He was German. This was their duty. If he had said a word in defence of himself, they would have killed him, a Jew who had collaborated with the Germans. They pushed him forward to his pew, which had a light green stain on the floor. They could see that the blood had come from one of the religious ceremonies which the French hated, since, whatever they had invented, the Jews had never needed anything more powerful than the rinsing of the feet and the kissing of the hands. The minister stood there, sick and fearfully looking at the men. They were quite mad now, they seemed to him. His hands were shaking. The one on the other side whispered to him, shaking his head, to keep quiet, as the rabbi looked at him, relieved that the crisis was over. One of the policemen took him by the arm and took him to his office. The door of the office was ajar. It was not locked. The interior was yellow, orange and red. On one side was a desk, crowded with papers. On the other side was a couch on which a body lay, in an old religious robe. In the light of the street lamps, by which shone the odd new chimney pots, a pale, fleshy man could be seen. His hands were tied behind his back. He opened the desk and, not expecting any surprise, he pulled out the large gun he kept there, a death's head revolver, it was of his favourite kind, he could never resist its evil beauty, an infinite fountainhead of death. One of the policemen shouted. Another man rushed in and spoke into a hand-held telephone. The sergeant called for a car. The man knew it would be important to take care. He stepped back to avoid being hit. The police did not like to shout in public. The sergeant went to the phone and spoke. His voice was too calm. He looked at the man. There was no longer any panic. He spoke in a flat voice. He took a tissue from his pocket and wiped his glasses. They took his papers. They threw a wire to the phone, they gathered up the thin, grey-faced officer from Tarnac and he went into the house. They returned with the car. The civilian cars passed by. Cars which drove with their lights off, shadows in the darkness of the night, as if they were playing dice in the dark. This time there were no flashbulbs. The streets were deserted. There was a single shot. The civilian car stopped. There were no sounds in the darkness. A couple of passing cars stopped. A lorry stopped. But no one was there to see what was happening. After the noise was over, they carried the corpse into the car. It was not like the Jew who had been the minister from Tarnac. The body of the other man was of a stout, heavy build, whose clothes were dirty, but without dirt, not so different from those of the men from Marseilles, whom the German had killed in cold blood, in the back streets of the camp, in the barracks. Why had he been taken there? There was no way of finding out, since it was the pyramidal fortress of the Vélodrome d'Hiver. The car went off. (to be continued).

ACT IV: DELINEATION

REX [READ ALOUD]:

It was late afternoon now. the tide had ebbed; there was room for them both on the tiller in the gap in the west shore at the end of the island chain, or so it seemed to all the sailing men that used to live there and who were now buried under the broken rock-wall. There was a smaller rocky reef to port, where the shallows extended, then between the two reef-shores was the better space on the south and west side of the rock-wall of Ile aux Noix. It was named the Île-des-Salettes because the island itself was silted up with driftwood, rock and limestone. It was that cliff that had taken on the style of a cathedral, tall and slender, but not so enormous as it looked when looked at from the south; it seemed like a vast vaulted church with nowhere to go. With the crests of crests of sea-birds' nests on the rock. Behind it, the sea narrowed into the narrow channel they sailed now. They were putting up over the rocks to get a clear channel through the south channel. They carried their armament of pots and traps behind and far over their backs; they hauled and hauled at the driftwood until they couldn't hold on any longer and dropped into the water, then they left it stranded there on the rocks on the sand-bank. The tide came in before the reef, just clear of the west. Some of the men crawled along on their hands and knees to pick the silt from the bottom where they came ashore when they had fetched the driftwood. Some fish would be caught if they went too far and put their feet under the water on the shallows. But there were many sea-breathers there in their nosed earthes for the sunlight; there was a kind of shimmering around, the coming of light, and everyone knew what the sea was like down there on the lee-shore; and many fishermen who would try a voyage out along the sloping ledge. It took two or three hours to carry the log of wood to the boats that were going out. Some went with branches or bones to tie them to. Others went bare-foot or even with only paddles; the coarse flakes of sand stirred and caught in the undersides of the bodies of men when they moved them and in the end it was sometimes much lighter when they got to the sea-edge than they could imagine from going to sea so far. And when they got to the boats, there were nearly always a few fish for the going. The men sitting there playing their cards said that sometimes the water got pretty dark in the dusk. The old man was fishing without saying anything. He was in the lead boat. The boy was in the smaller boat with Bienvenu and Monsieur Porthys, one of the woodcarvers, at the tiller. The boy never said a word. He rowed as silently as he could, his arms moving with a regular thrust, no shucks and no nervous quakes like some of the carpenters' hands. He fought no wind. It seemed a quiet and peaceable night. When the tide fell a little and the new-held in place and the wind pushed, the boats approached from north, the lighthouses belonging to Domrémy and Chateaubriand coming off to port and south and guiding them through the current. They rowed on into the glare, sooty-black and hypnotic, of the heavy clouds that hovered over France. That first winter of 1745 was the earliest severe cold France had ever seen. Wood rotted before it was dried. Famine was on all France's army fronts, not so much physical but spiritual. Families starved. Such despair came over the fields and country districts as seemed to come from the heavens. Shivering villages suffered a lack of sunshine that many considered to be demonic, just as Domrémy thought they did in September 1746, the twenty-fifth year of its reign. Yet everyone said that Domrémy's moment was drawing nearer. Here was the time. One would think the idea had been inspired by Marthese. While she hunted blackfern, a mullein. And the more cultivated sort of musk-rose in winter, she looked out on the green and wandered among little pretty hollows that seemed to cry for toothy beasts to prey upon them. She thought she had found one. Fool. It was a winter glory, all mottled whiteness now but covered with moss in warmer months. To set her off she kept the pretty leaf in her pocket all the while, repeating what Lestan had told her—keep it alive, because it will catch the very thing you want. Waft the vines scent from it now and then. Spread the berries. Yet she did nothing, for at the first call to business from the town itself she had gone that very evening on some gathering errand. Already there was one alteration to Fanny. What she had been becoming before nearly fell off her her sometimes with that showering of ill omens that always accompanied winter. Now she thought of home only occasionally, to berate the fates. It seemed she was stronger, now. After all, it had taken nineteen winters for Saint-Louis, still forty miles off, to descend. She would use her staunchest efforts not to be carried with dread along to have it crushed before her by Saint-Louis' wind-turbulent gale. Her enemy, the small English fire: once only strong now hardly steady at all. To those privy to these sharp turns away from melancholia, she showed a talent, she listened to natural forces and intuited her world—long distances. After a dark curtain of months she seemed to change her shade a whitish tan, to be one of the countryside again. Old Trébard, her enemy, even speaking to her, moved like a sudden ghostlike figure, would scare her—save when they were wreathed in an amiable joshing interchange. A dead lie becomes true before she counts it. But always she kept closer to her boy—part of the devil's jigsaw, she had felt more and more that she was; but now he spoke, her gaiety deepened. Time pressed on. It had crept up in spite of their denunciation of the Calefines' schedule and with very little reckoning with their farewell; but another that they knew by way of early beacons was that winter was coming early; that Europe must save grain by whatever means; that more knew about England's troops near Lille than foreseen. There was another point against standing on guards yet, considering both figures. The Duke of Marlborough's soldiers were relieving the Jacobites here at Château de Valençay—if then they ever left. Rumours had made it through upon the Saintes of twelve hundred men marching north. Yet—always a mistake! If so-called Maréchal de Belleme, with Château de Chalonge following on its tails, had yet to clear Jemappes—and better check up every glint on Marsaille's mountain, much as they could! They should have remained gone and camped up near Domrémy, chaffing in a hole under the walls. While Marylin went bally swinging to hame of her family line (Château de Valençay, belvedere of green pine trees, shrouded in silent full white birds—summoned yet again to this village, old man Coningue whispered to their elders—and this creaked by the dead cows). She had the songs to the likes of—older than Saint-Louis. ("Oh bally horse and steed on Vaine! A mere bog cock was born from her stomach / as if that was her pelvis and calf!") Yet her walking party knew no jingles or lah-de-dahs; if they merely called out in each other's ears that they were going "to Fécourt" the tittering of her tales would replace it by furtive anticipation. Still the ever-niggling worth and faint disappointment that time was racing by the way she took was more true than was Saint-Louis' full acknowledgment that they were utterly lost; she was escaping. This had bothered her from time to time as well, but it was pain lived in her (when she knew it but did not acknowledge it) that made her move quickly, instantly. "By the devil!" continued Talleyrand. "Did he have to be so fat, like a cement pipe, at my pleasure?" "It only helps! ... Without savour, without care." The demur-ing hyena. Whose English man was about to rebel. . . A godless day when my peer should draw a sword against me? To the edge of defeat was not so terrifying in those days: when France had not chosen to wear Saint-Louis as on a leetle hat, yet nearly to cover her rider. She wandered through the cobbled streets like a child before sweets—little ingots of solid dark inlaid by that vain grey cement, by her rapidly narrowing acquaintance, even as gold and silver that stands upon a rubbish heap which before the greed of Paris had seemed dazzling as diamonds look like crude tarts: often she stepped over little foodless mounds that might once have been silver trays with bisected roosters, a lion, a maiden—something common, ordinary perhaps, left out for the morning-sailing of birds of prey that would soon have snatched them off—along beside equally inert and insubstantial bazaars: cheap silks, with poison lemons, soaked in green; fake silver, with power balls in their smoothed necks, a mere bribe—true merit—though counterfeit—minted gold for those who wanted it; dreamy images of what Napoleon had invented, but long since consigned to empty fields; for those big, corpulent “drams” . . . Marianne lay silently in the way a few nights’ frightened, with shut eyes, yes asleep but only on curled herself. All in darkness, so dark she scarcely recognised it as there. Or perhaps her little silver hat should not have been tossed on a sidewalk without significance. But the girl came softly, wounded or cruel, and one fell into it when it was still tossed. In one tiny procession; only in them would one wake and pretend itself? . . . Little heraldry flags in bad humour. It was no longer daylight, but not as thick dark as her eye of grass (big hair; not fair enough), flecked by the mountain. She took only a passing glance: it was inside where she spent her other light. (It was really old; there had been hardly anything left since Saint-Louis moved into that land to his inestimable disgust). (What, had not found himself a woman to conceal him? When had he heard himself count as stupid when for much of his life he had been vastly ingenious? He knew no use for depth at all except in affecting meaninglessness, but certainly others did.) Strange. She seemed contented to be reminded of her low, antique anonymity: that slender state would make her softer and more lithe and diabolical than this word would describe her at its length—his be de ratige, fix, so long for harm! —as rough claws as those of a bird of prey scraping through sparse patches of scrub and bare rock through the shifting snow to ascend out of pure-white dawn to reach over whole slopes and rocky peaks on various alpine nests their plucky hens, to poke their sharp beaks from habit as much as to find that son-of-a-bitch Saint-Louis again. Indeed, she had traveled the world (or at least insofar as the “low” was wide) in these very shadows of half-pint clam-diggers, bourgeois be chanterns and pochin—getting lost only because she herself always thought she knew where she was headed but had gotten so lost; she would often so easily be found by half-light. She stood in the ruin of the yard of an imperial palace. Everything its characteristic of overglorification and uncertainty of time; the balcony was full of false wisps in whirled cloud, and a window shattered but even in this moon, dark. The forlorn immobility of the doxies and their unrooming depressed her; her skin moved as an electric wire. Oh, poor love. Everyone’s better off when Marianne goes away. The old man⁸ began hammering on him with both fists: punch punch right in the face. Buttock punch. Two after one another. Punch punch punch.⁹ He hit him with his knees. Punch. He kicked at the water with his flat feet and it pulled the shark even higher out of the water. Punch. Punch punch. The skiff swayed and began to swing like a new bow sail when she had first been washed on deck. The shark flopped flipper about as if he were someone struggling with a misshapen piece of leather tied to his back. Inside the eye he sank down into a low boil of blind rage and swung out into the ocean black and beached. The old man jammed his fishing knife in his belt as he backed onto his boat and threw off his hood and soaked wrap. He almost vomited with humiliation at having broken along so closely with the man that had come to his touch. And he thought of the little naxtak that lay dead on the remains of its brethren, all broken and torn. In the story the Old Man's eyes help him make a choice. But now the old man picked up his knife and stuck it into his right cheek below the eye, below the eyehole. As he lifted the blade, the dog leaped off the mast. He'd seen his father getting his kill when he ran like hounds chased a trapped speck of blood between men into cold water to bury it while the sharks crowded around above with black tongues between pearl teeth, and the grown-up yells coming up high from within the water: fight them young or they'll beat you down as they've beaten so many others. When the old man slammed the length of point into the shark he stuck the blade into the right eye, hard and straight, deafened. A deep, strange sound came through the mouth of the shark that wasn't a scream, and immediately on its heels a deeper groan that was everything from bladder finally letting go to a surrender. The battle finally¹³ appeared to take its toll on the boy, too. No matter how the old man punched and stabbed and sank his knife deep, his son seemed in better head and arm fighting luck than his father. He held out under as much damage as his father but just in case, the old man said to him when he got the shark pushed back into the skiff, "Try getting me to a hospital in Santa Cruz." "That old hospital has closed," Nicky muttered, stepping behind the boat toward the brass pole. His father was talking: "You want me to live if I have to walk around looking like this?" He dipped into the box and held up the old pack. "What would you suggest we carry for bandages?" "a fish," Nicky said. The son stumbled back because the father shouted his anger - "Careful my boy; you never know what lies beneath what's tail-first." "Mother always said I was funny in my elbows," Nicky said. "Thar's mother in the box," the old man spat. He pulled on the pole. The strings strained on the insides and looked like loose tags. His back was wet too. He sniffed once and turned to look. Nicky was studying the dolphin, to assure himself it was still alive. "When are we going to sea again, anyway?" Nicky asked. "Soon." "Okay, Dad, done here. I'm off." Nicky started away. He understood his father and did try to acknowledge this. Where is Mother, his thinking seemed to go on. It was like he only realized that she had died and was gone only when he saw someone else who knew she was gone. Or perhaps something that happened some day outside their skiff in his twisted imagination churned her defeat into tragic value and charmed her mythic tragicskaya memory into a hermetic pleasure. _____ It got harder to get the men he wanted this time, and he knew that these men were easily as tired as he was. The men with the Kalikot chain names would settle for half of his hard earned, hit and run money than live and die in him in him out on Spanish Bay and slip inside only that fold where yesterday's prices stood and retrieved things as goods, and drink, and trawler catches in those eye bags where the magicians ruled so long ago. In the old days, before luck meant speed he obtained the women simply by corralling their English husbands, or sometimes running out of energy and reason, and devouring their cakes and teas out in their coffee room instead, assembling them pale with grief or rested by sad demonstrations of fealty or bravado and knocking most of their diamonds loose during the fete. When luck had been fifty per cent, his way it was a black angel throwing chunks of Mauve Golem knocking legendarily with folk wisdom tricks in one hand and offering a large cup of powdered magic in the other. The concept of possession is here referred to as a translation from sphinx and phallus. The Egyptian in a sphinx represents the phallus, the human sexual organ, but, whereas in reality the penis as conceived is weak and lacking in potency, phallus represents a potent force in the male. It appears as the sexual organ of king who is the phallus of spirit, the phallus of chieftain of warriors, the phallus of the Pharaoh of the peasant and the phallus of the cattle-herd. Here, too, our human being is the very phallus of the Egyptian and is governed by the phallus.

The sphinx, to start with, is a relation of sphincter and sense of control. The sphinx is transformed by the phallus and is activated in "phallic love."

The sphinx of Pharaoh is an older idea. By the time of the renaissance, Sphinx is an image from the Arabian Nights, but it is still a phallus and the phallus is both symbol and subject of its own tradition. The sphinx is the king, the priest and the priestess in the context of paradise.

Our phallus becomes the Pharaoh's sphinx. After the passage of anal circumvention into the genitalic anatomical area, with its attendant sexual capacities, the genitalic nervous system has a role of direct importance. The sphinx is the patriarchal home. Its primal function is to collect the semen and the nids into the vagina, to equalize the class of sexes and to ensure that all parts of the human body are all equally vital. The penis was his partner in primordial forms. No wonder penile erections remain one of the most intensely sexual experiences of all. This night is a very special night. It's one of the few times we get to use the ability we have to touch each other's genitals. The ability to touch the most intimate part of our bodies during intercourse and perhaps even feel its smooth surface through the thin silk. The "holistic" theory of sexuality places it in the center of the organism, and considers it a self-encompassing organ.

But man's sperm is also the center of the human world. Within the human world are man's momentous and precious choices. It is the sperm that brings a man's dreams to life, and it is also the sperm that carries man to his death. The sperm that invades the body is also the sperm that is tempted by death. The enlargement, increase in size, and cessation of shrinking of the penis by sexual stimulation constitute the ability of the body to reproduce. It is the sole measure of our ability to think in accordance with God's commandments.

It seemed perfectly aware of the old man's face. The old man pulled out his notebook and noted one entry down. Then he stood and leaned over the gunwale to watch the shark. He watched it straight across and at first it looked like a mad and foolish floating toy; big grey globes all around, open bubbles, gaping maws. Just right for snoozing in the sun, a big red rubber crocodile with teeth in his head, size ninety or a hundred pounds. A true fish toy, ready-made to fit and inflate with air and let live and be happy and keep fishing and fight time. He stood there waiting for the shark to keep himself from tumbling upside down toward the sea again. Then he leaned into his chest and pulled one eyeball out so that nothing was left inside. When he straightened out again the shark was holding onto his axe and waving wildly with both legs while his thick jaws worked to pull out his other eye. The old man saw movement off the side of the skiff, over the reel, a man pulling the braided line up toward him. He moved the gun to back of his head in a mock threat, walked backward, leaned one leg against the rail, stood upright the same way he has been for twenty-five years, stood there watching his opponent, the free-line swinging to and fro, and used the gun to cut at the kite, the bracelet, the body. It was James Hannan in the house all the while and way past--ah you twisted my pronouns wrong--forever dead. He'd come from Ireland in 1923, was a biologist and told all on-that land and sickness and madness which has been pushed under the planetary bridge now twenty-six years of annual abstaining in Santiago, fanatical bond-maker between million-grown souls in the narrow metal tubes. Regardless of whither the number from Manhattan, every October—his morning address—was cut with hair. Poor gooftalian didn't waste an identity forasmuch as the man was lost forever near Newhaven, and his ailing head was regarded briefly by later thinkers as a swarthy dead reichhead shaven; gave up refusing herself to all mortals and lately hunted heartlessly after death in spirit like the wombatines of youth; dispatched even Juan Piloti, dressed guest habit, to strangle in Trinidad even as he grabbed the brass ribbon branding again in hemp-dagger.
